Excerpt from The Experiment of Faith: A Plea for Reality in Religion

The writer was university preacher recently in a great collegiate town. He was feeling his way towards the message he was to give the young men and women who would hear him the following week. He spoke to several of the students about it and to one member of the faculties.

One of the students, with the frankness of youth, replied: "Preach on anything except the war; we have been 'fed up' on that." Another, a rather serious-minded young Churchman, said: "Suppose for a change you give us some straight Christianity; we get mighty little of it from the ordinary college preacher."

The enquirer took these suggestions to his faculty friend and asked what he made of the criticisms that lay beneath the suggestions. As he interpreted the thought of the men, it would appear that many people in these days are thinking about spiritual things more seriously than ever before.
