AESOP (Greek, About 619-564 B. C.)

SOMEWHERE in ancient Greece, the land of white-pillared cities and stately marble temples, was born the little slave boy, Aesop. While he was still a child, Aesop was brought to the far-famed city of Athens.

There he was sold, like an ox or a sheep, from one master to another and performed in each household the hard and thankless duties of a slave. Nevertheless, he was always enlivening his tasks by the brightest and cleverest sallies of wit, which often threw his comrades into gales of laughter.

Once, it is said, he and his fellow slaves were about to set out on a long journey with a certain merchant who was their master. Heavy bundles of necessary clothing and provisions were prepared for each of the slaves to carry.

"Master, grant me to carry the lightest bundle," cried Aesop. "Sobeit! Select the lightest," his master answered. Immediately Aesop stepped forward and chose the heaviest and most unwieldy package of all
