Excerpt from Village Belles, Vol. 2 of 3: A Novel

Whether Rosina's tears originated in a little remorse, a little repentance, a little love, a little agitation at the unequivocal nature of Lewis's language, or a little unsteadiness of spirits occasioned by the heat, the fatigue of walking, and a mixture of all the above mentioned emotions together, it may be difficult to determine; but as no time could be worse chosen for weeping than the epoch of a fete champetre, her eyes were speedily dried, and she walked forward without casting "one lingering look behind."
